

"HIGHER LAW" IN KENTUCKY.

[illegible]

employ in mines, smelting works, rolling mills,

The Great Council of Nine proposes a few laws which suggest an industrial moral. It says "Wreckers are already hauling the wool of the Dales at two and a-half or three cents per pound. At the Dales it will pay storage, carting and commission; the process will be repeated at Fording and perhaps at San Francisco. It will pay insurance, a liberal profit on the returns, cartage and commission on the wool that transport it. Likely it will go to New England, be made into clothing, and after turning across the postoffice and paying profit to a dozen dealers, in addition to the sale price, be, as on its first trip will be sold, its first owner at about seven times the price recovered for it. It is evident that a wool factory will not pay in direct money."

Is not the effort to enforce the liquor ordinance of the city proceeding in a needless and inefficient way? Public nuisance was once exhausted with such feignings. The common council would do well to devise means of doing more effectively with the same. The order could be enforced not by the police, but by the twice-repeated shut up. It is useless to say this cannot do. How much longer is the city going to allow its authority to be trifled with?

The New York World thinks the proposition of the Herald for a coalition of the republicans and democrats is not an absurd one to imagine. It says "many signs go to show that the professional man got control of the Hook and Ladder in 1850, and made a name for themselves by concocting a conspiracy to put Mr. Bane into the speaker's chair with the help of republicans."
